Fruits and vegetables are parts of plants. We use them in different forms, either after cooking or in the raw form, as salads. They are natural sources of vitamins, fibres and many minerals. The sweet and succulent produce of a plant is generally referred to as a fruit. The rest of the edible parts are vegetables. These could be leaves as in the case of spinach, the roots as in the case of radish, or the flowers as in cauliflower. Most fruits are available for human use in raw form, for instance, apple, mango, banana and orange.

However, botanists may disagree with these generalizations. Scientifically speaking, a fruit is the matured ovary of a flowering plant (angiosperm), which means that it contains seeds. According to the botanical definition tomatoes, pumpkins, cucumbers, and zucchini are fruits as they contain seeds. Traditions and cultures play a great role in deciding the status of vegetables and fruits.

While fruits have an exact botanical definition, vegetables do not. Fruits are those parts of plants, which contain seeds, but for vegetables to have seeds is not an obligation. This is the basic reason behind the classification of tomatoes and cucumbers among fruits. Fruits, usually, have sugar called fructose, which gave them a sweet taste, whereas vegetables are, usually, savory. Fruits could be used in raw form, whereas only some vegetables can be used in raw form. Fruits protect seeds while vegetables could be any part of a plant. Their uses also make them different from each other, but both are important for the existence of life on this planet.
